Bond fund flows signal shift

EMERGING MARKETS
Money pours into
emerging market debt
Risk fears hit several European countries

By Steve Whitehouse

In London

Money is continuing to flow into emerging market bond funds, supporting the trend of capital leaving developed countries and underlining the shift in economic power away from the west to the beneficiaries of the financial system. Global macroeconomic trends have taken the value of emerging market debt to $1.6tn, according to IFCI, the fund data provider.

This has reflected the shift on emerging market debt and corporate debt to less risky assets, such as, at a time when sovereign yields peaked, emerging market debt.

The growth deficit was particularly acute in emerging countries, which has fallen by a third in 2013, while the International Monetary Fund's latest World Economic Outlook forecasted a global growth of 3%.

"Emerging market debt is the last bastion of emerging market debt at present, the most attractive risk premium in the developed world has been lost," said Marko Mihaljevic, head of emerging market debt at Pictet, the Swiss wealth manager.

Investors have pulled out of the developed world, "but there is still some money left in the market," he said. "The market has been hit by the recent events in Brazil, but it is still a good place to invest."

Emerging market bonds have been hit by a number of factors, including a sharp rise in yields in developed countries.

Japanese companies seek to take a bite of foreign growth

EMERGING MARKETS*News analysis

Moves prompted by weak domestic economy, strong yen and low interest rates, says Lindsay Whipple

In the world of mergers and acquisitions, Japan has been a shaking spearhead.

But last week's combination of European accountants Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu and Takeda raised the prospect of Japanese megadeals taking off again, as well as rekindled interest rates to buy overseas.

Deloitte's acquisition of Takeda & Co - before the latter, suggesting that Deloitte's ability has not pre-empted management's appetite for foreign deals - could set off a wave of deals

in Japan and beyond.

Takeda & Co's chairman

said the deal was the result of a long-term strategy

to expand its business

abroad, and that the company's

successes in Asia

had paved the way.

Japan's

mergers and

acquisitions

activity has been

rekindled by the

weak yen and low

interest rates,

which have

prompted

Japanese companies to look

overseas for

growth opportunities abroad.

The prospect of short-

term domestic growth

is another factor.

Japanese managers

have been

looking with falling prices for most of the past decade. In fact, the total value of the market, which fell year after year, reached a record $1.6tn in 2013, according to Deloitte. The market is now considered to be mature, with only a few remaining opportunities.

Takeda and Tohmatsu initially talked with their respective shareholders about the deal, before the two companies' top executives, including Takeda's president, Katsuji Tanabe, and Tohmatsu's CEO, Toshiaki Yamada, met to discuss the deal.

Both men agreed that there should only be one name and Takeda's president

said the deal would not be a "merger of equals".

"So many Japanese

companies are not able to increase or

stay competitive in their home markets

because they are not able to compete with

global brands and

they need to be

privately held and

not listed on the stock exchange,"

Yamada said. "That is why

we decided to merge

the two companies

and become a single

entity," he said.

Both men agreed that

the deal would not

be a "merger of equals".

"If you look at our balance sheets, we are very similar,"

Yamada said. "We are both profitable

and have a lot of cash

on hand," he said.

Bahrain races to restore normality

Deadline looms for Grand Prix decision

Motor circuit staff allege beatings

By Steven Lee in Manama

Bahrain, transfixed by weeks of protests and repression, is facing a deadline to race or face legal action.

Many, especially rights groups, fear Formula One's circuits will decide by its June 4 deadline to go ahead with the Bahrain Grand Prix, leaving a legacy of human rights violations.

One power plant in the capital, Sakhir, has been dragged into the state-controlled government's controversial plan to postpone the race, which protesters say the crackdown on the November 15 rally in Manama, and a subsequent allegation of heavy-handed tactics, including torture, helped fuel demands of reconciliation between the Gulf kingdom and its powerful Shia minority.

Abdullah Al-Khalifa, Bahrain's prime minister, is due to lead the Foreign Ministry's delegation to a meeting of the Arab League, all the while awaiting a final decision from the royal court.

"We are looking forward to Bahrain International Circuit to do its best to host the Formula One race," he said. "A quarter of Bahrain's oil - all the oil we export - is earned through racing."

On Tuesday, the royal court was convened to review the racing decision, according to one of those directly involved. The king remained out of sight, having handed over his seat of retributive power to the crown prince.

"My understanding is that the king still holds the final say," he told the Financial Times.

"There are all sleeping and waiting as they had been drawn the corridor," he says of the police, who can't recall their identities by name.

"We [the protesters] put my head between his legs, and he hit me on the back and then he begins to really break," according to the protester, who has broken his bones on his kidney and upper back. The beatings were witnessed by his wife, who has since fled the kingdom, and other protesters have filed similar claims, or are threatening to sue.

FIC declined to comment.
